

From Hazelwood to Home, Silence of the Press Persists

During a time in which people are being encouraged to speak up about what they deem is important, some of America's most valuable voices are being silenced.

Among them are student journalists who simply want to exercise freedom of the press, a right guaranteed under the First Amendment, by covering pressing issues in their communities. When considering how to deal with the censorship of student journalists, Hazelwood School District v. Kuhlmeier (1988) is used as a model.

According to a case summary published by United States Courts, two articles written for Hazelwood East High School's newspaper The Spectrum, sparked controversy. The stories covered the experiences of the impact of divorce and teen pregnancy among the young authors' peers. Before they could be released, the high school's principal failed to inform the students that he had erased the articles from the paper. Upon realizing there were pages missing from The Spectrum, students of the Journalism II class that penned the stories formed a case against the school district and took it to the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Missouri in St. Louis.
